

HARVEY KUBERNIK-TRAVIS PIKE JANUARY 2016 OUTSIDE THE BOX INTERVIEW

Travis Edward Pike at 71-year-old. (December 2015)
Click on the photo to visit his personal website.

HK: We've discussed your musical history going back to 1964. It's time, now, to focus on the future, your new, early 2016 release. Tell me your approach to songwriting in general. Do you write the words first and then add music?

TP: At my most prolific, songs come to me in dreams -- words and music together. I kick them around in my head and pick out their melodies on a guitar or keyboard, to fix it in my musical memory. Sometimes, if the melody is particularly strong, writing the lyrics and chord changes is enough.

More frequently, I diddle around on a guitar or piano and discover something I like. I play with it for a while, letting the music move through me, getting a feeling for its program. Is it about love won or love lost, a quest, or an exploration of some sort? Music may be whimsical or serious, and depending on the mood the music excites in my imagination, words begin to flow. Some lines are dead on arrival, others are worth developing. Finally, aware of what the song is meant to be, I flesh it out. The songs I've kept through the years are the ones that best captured their programs. Rarely, words affect the program. When that happens, I rework the tonalities, rhythms and melodies to support the lyrics.

HK: Do you title the tunes first, or do you wait until a song is fully developed before you name it?

TP: I can only think of one time when the title came first and I then wrote music and lyrics to go with it. Shortly after I moved to Hollywood, I enrolled at the California Polytechnic University in Pomona. In my first quarter, I explored a number of interests, including a course in Modern Art, that introduced me to Marcel Duchamp's futurist, cubist painting style. I liked his "Nude Descending a Staircase," but could not connect his "Passage from Virgin to Bride" to the painting it was supposed to describe.

Believing the title was better suited to music, I composed a tone poem for it. I was pleased with the result, but knew of no market for it, so I filed it away. In October, 2014, my brother, Adam, suggested we take a look at what I had left in my files. He was particularly interested in seeing some of my orchestrated scores, so I let him see my "Passage of the Virgin to the Bride."

I gave him all the notation pages -- instrumental parts, six pages of orchestrated song, and three orchestrated parts that didn't seem to go with anything else. As he coaxed the melodies from the pages, I began remembering parts and voicings, but didn't remember exactly where they entered, until Adam determined the three page section was a fairly long orchestral introduction to the song. Parts identified, we reconstructed the arrangement, started laying down tracks, and the "Andalusian Bride Suite" was born.

HK: When you were composing, did you record demos of your songs on a cassette player?

Adam deciphered my score — two sets of orchestrated staff paper, some parts without assigned instruments, and all starting, it turned out, on unrelated page ones!

TP: I recorded band rehearsals at Lightfoot Recording Studios in Jamaica Plain, Massachusetts, back in 1966-67, regularly making demos to fix melodies or rhythms on tape so I could use them as a guide to refine my arrangements, both musical and lyrical. When we were no longer rehearsing at Lightfoot, I continued to record demos on my reel-to-reel recorders, monophonic at first, then stereophonic, then four track sound-on-sound, which allowed me to experiment with parts and more fully develop the themes and counterpoint within the tunes. That all started before cassette decks came on the scene, and since I already had all the recording gear, when they did, I never switched over.

HK: You're calling this new selection Outside the Box.

TP: Yes. Outside the Box accurately describes the new album's odd mix of musical periods and genres.

HK: Does Los Angeles factor into this new compilation?

TP: Absolutely. When Travis Pike's Tea Party packed it in, I moved to Hollywood and began writing Changeling, my early attempt at a rock opera, and I enrolled in music classes at CalPoly Pomona to learn the fundamentals of music notation, the range and sounds of orchestra instruments, and to better understand musical structure.

On the first day, the professor handed out an entrance exam, all about modes and intervals, of which I hadn't a clue. So while the music majors took the test, I wrote a note in the margin, addressing the professor as a colleague, explaining that although I didn't know intervals or modes, I was an internationally published singer and songwriter with film, TV and recording credits, and if he admitted me to his class, I'd learn everything I was required to know before classes officially began. Allowed in on trial, that weekend I devoured the entire fundamentals book and mastered both intervals and modes before the first class meeting. And at the end of the quarter, I aced the course.

In Hollywood, there was no shortage of excellent, trained studio musicians, and being able to write notation freed me to seek out the best I could afford to record my demos. I organized the Changeling Troupe, to record "Changeling," which I did at Conway Recording Studios at the corner of Melrose and St. Andrews Place in Hollywood. Changeling Troupe's gifted roster included Marian Petrocelli, keyboards and vocals; Melodie Bryant, keyboards, recorder, and vocals; Ann Sanders, vocals; Steve Pugliese, keyboards; Greg Bischoff, lead guitar; Phil Cataldo, electric bass; Ken Park, drums and percussion; and me, on rhythm guitar, recorder, and vocals.

The inspiration for "Lovely Girl I Married" dates back to my 1968 wedding in West Covina, California, but I only wrote the song this year. I never had a "Friend in Fresno" before, but I do now, and I record all my material with my brother, Adam, in Pasadena, California. We manage most of the instrumental work and vocals ourselves, in his home studio, but bring in talented outside musicians and vocalists (mostly female), for parts we can't do ourselves. One such musician is David Pinto, who will be playing the Baroque pipe organ and Harpsichord passages for "Witch."

Travis plays his basic "Witch" passacaglia for David Pinto.

(top) David makes last-minute notes. (center) David plays the organ and harpsichord parts. (bottom) Everyone is happy with the session. Otherworld Cottage is proud to support David's non-profit Academy of Music for the Blind.

It was David who first introduced me to this method of recording in his home studio. He is an extraordinary keyboard artist, composer, and arranger, whose work with Ray Charles inspired him to found the Academy of Music for the Blind, a non profit organization that is the only music school dedicated to blind music students.

HK: You're 71 and vocally, not the rocker you were in Germany.

TP: True, and I haven't been a "Twistsensation" since my 1964 car wreck in Germany, either. Lacking the leaps and twists of my early on-stage performances, I had to rely on my original songs and vocal intensity. In the sixties, often abusing my voice for dramatic effect, leading to a plethora of over-the-counter remedies for hoarseness and sore throat. When in 1987, after a long hiatus from live performance, I recorded Morningstone at David Pinto's home studio, the "howling" highs were downright painful, and I could only manage a few passes before I began to lose my voice. When I realized that for a recording, I didn't have to shout over a 115-decibel band, I stopped straining my voice, dropped the once loud howls at the end of vocal sections (primarily used to cue a live band that it was time for an instrumental release), and substituted practiced "softer" howls, which could be brought forward as required in the mix. I still sometimes push my voice for effect, but rarely, with the happy result that I am seldom hoarse and have few sore throats after recording sessions.

HK: How did you approach this new album? Was there a concept or a theme in place before you even started recording?

TP: Not really. I was just trying to clean out the vault. I knew from the start that the album would be an eclectic mix of styles and moods, but these were songs I really didn't want lost, and there were new songs too, inspired by recording with Adam. Between the two of us, and with a little help from our friends, I was confident that we could record anything I could imagine, and that revelation reignited my sleeping Muses and led to the several new songs I wrote for this album.

HK: Do you record and then a theme emerges and you think about sequencing?

TP: Yes. We record first, sequence after. Each song is a statement in itself. Sequencing a set for a live performance, or arranging titles on an album, is much the same process. In an upbeat dance venue, driving music will predominate, but you'll slip in a few ballads so that people can actually hold their partners. Concert performances require strong openers. For me, that usually meant a powerful, upbeat number (or two, or three), to get the audience excited, but then, I'd do something tender and meaningful, to give both the audience and the band a breather, something soothing to gentle the crowd. Rock operas have inherent structure, so one hopes their sequencing has been well thought-out by the composer ahead of time, and I tend to sequence a themed album the same way I would a live performance. Blues are blues, but there are rocking blues, wailing blues, and tragic blues, all capable of holding an audience. Whoever creates the set, for stage or recordings, will try to sequence the songs to showcase each one, maintain an audience's interest, and provide an opportunity for the talent to shine.

This new album is such a mixed bag that it will be difficult to sequence. The only unifying theme is that they're all composed by me. I doubt that we'll address that issue until after all the songs are mixed, but ask me then, and I'll tell you what we were thinking and why we sequenced it the way we did. It's such an eclectic assortment, no matter what we decide, it's liable to seem like we just pulled the sequence out of a hat.

HK: What have you learned in the process working and collaborating with your brother Adam, a producer/engineer? What are his strengths in the studio? There is a big age difference between you. Is he like someone in a band?

TP: Adam was and is a skilled musician in his own right. He studied music at Pasadena City College, took outside courses in recording and has mastered all the software and peripherals that make his compact recording studio an excellent production environment, especially conducive to independent audio productions.

Multi-instrumentalist, producer, audio engineer, composer, and arranger Adam Pike, in his studio

Adam has all the skills I lack and need in order to realize my musical objectives. My experience, creativity, and maturity thrive in his creative environment, and our combined skills result in musical achievements neither of us might have achieved on our own. The difference in our ages is not a liability, but an asset, and our different perspectives definitely influence our productions for the better. So Adam is not like someone in a band, at least not to me. I don't say our blood-relationship makes communication any easier between us than between either of us and an outsider, but I do believe it inspires us to continue communicating, until we reach an understanding and an acceptable accommodation.

HK: You're using background singers in the new batch of recordings. Why, and what do they bring to propel your music and words?

TP: Their voices add color and pitch that is out of reach to either of us, and under my direction, they can be used to directly support the lyric, or provide an counterpoint attitude perspective to the song, not necessarily inherent in the lyrics. Take "I'd love that." A negative tone of voice conveys the exact opposite of what a positive tone of voice conveys.

Karen Callahan preparing to sing her vocal part for "Witch."

HK: Some of the songs on this album go back a ways. Can you discuss the 1974-birthed tunes and take me through the evolution of the songs as they developed over the decades?

TP: "Witch" is a show tune, originally composed for my Faustian rock opera, Changeling, in which the protagonist invokes "spirits" (that he doesn't believe exist), to woo an impressionable young lady, (who also doesn't believe in spirits, but plays along to humor him). The mood set in Changeling by "Witchy Stew" was playful, but "Witch" is relentless, dark, and horrific. As Changeling morphed into Morningstone, the song was initially retained, but finally cut when it no longer served the plot, although it was then, and remains still, one of my favorite works, because I had just completed my music classes at CalPoly, Pomona, and my application of the knowledge gained in those studies profoundly influenced its arrangement.

When I began Changeling, I was already familiar with the concept of sympathetic magic, and had researched occult and supernatural phenomena. About half-way through, I was introduced to and greatly influenced by Robert Graves' The White Goddess. I composed "Witch" in an ominous and relentless passacaglia, a Baroque style, best known today through Bach's Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor, believed to have been composed between 1706 and 1713, more than 80 years after the notorious witch burnings in Würzburg and Bamberg, Bavaria, during the 30 Years' War. My introduction to Bach's organ music came at the hands of Ed Hastings, organist and choirmaster at the Dudley Street Baptist Church in Boston, Massachusetts, who managed to convey all the terrors of hellfire and damnation my adolescent ears could absorb in the interval when the faithful filed into the sanctuary for Sunday services.

I derived its rhythm from Beethoven's 7th Symphony, 2nd movement, sometimes referred to as his "Ode to Dance." Although Beethoven's early works do not officially belong to the Romantic Period, this later piece embodies Romanticism for me, and it was through that prism that I wanted to reveal the horror of that dark period of European history.

My "Otherworld March" was originally intended to be the curtain opener for Changeling, featuring devilish pyrotechnics and modern interpretive dance.

About the same time I took the music courses, I took my first Art History course, and my "Andalusian Bride Suite" was indirectly inspired by Duchamp's Passage From Virgin to Bride. I began composing it in 1974, and the music suggests both Spanish and Moorish (North African) influence. However, by the time Adam and I got around to recording it, the gods and traditions attributed to early Celtiberian, Visigothic, and Roman inhabitants of the Iberian peninsula had been incorporated, and the bride had become Andalusian.

"Phantoms" was written for Changeling, a revelation of the altered reality induced by the protagonist's meddling in the occult. The original song never made it into Morningstone, and its lyrics are no longer of interest to me, but its psychedelic keyboard parts provide an excellent backdrop for a song about (and against), the recreational use of mind-altering substances. In the early 70's, the pervasive use of drugs took three stellar, 27-year-old icons of pop music, and their deaths were not geographically isolated. Jimi Hendrix died in London in September, 1970, of an overdose of barbituates; Janice Joplin died in Los Angeles in October, 1970, of an overdose of heroin; and Jim Morrison died in Paris in July, 1971. A suspected overdose of heroin is listed as the probable cause of his death. I was still actively pursuing my music career back then, and was deeply affected by those tragedies.

In "Psychedelic Meltdown," I imagine one such deadly scenario. Do the victims start out believing it's all under control, thrilled by the effects of their altered perceptions? Do they slowly lose themselves in a drug induced delirium? In my instrumental bridge, I imagine they might even enjoy tracking the musical spiders that descend like tiny time bombs into their conscious and unconscious. Is there a split-second when they realize it's too late? Having never experienced whereof I wrote, I nearly abandoned the idea, but now, alive and still producing at 71-years-old, my lack of first-hand experience through personal experimentation doesn't seem as important to me as the message I hope to convey. The dead cannot tell their tales. My song deals with the seductive and potentially fatal consequences of drug abuse. It may be in poor taste, but if it results in a listener avoiding a tragedy, poor taste may be better than none at all.

Travis tells Colleen Stratton how he wants her to deliver her lines for "Psychedelic Meltdown."

HK: You also take us into psychedelic land in "Flying Snakes."

TP: I never said Travis Pike's Tea Party didn't explore "psychedelic land" musically. We knew tea was a euphemism for marijuana, but as a home-grown Boston group, we took our name from the historical 1773 incident in Boston Harbor. Although we were never into mind-altering drugs, I did come up with the idea to use "The Unbirthday Song" from the tea party sequence in Disney's Alice in Wonderland. I was, and still am a big fan of Grace Slick and Jefferson Airplane's "White Rabbit."

That said, I think I wrote the original "Flying Snakes" around 1976. I had submitted Morningstone for review to a major talent agency. They passed, and the script was returned to me with a snarky internal-agency note still attached, describing Morningstone as "pseudo-intellectual bullshit." Had I known Morningstone was to be vetted by a provincial miscreant, I wouldn't have wasted the postage. Rejection, while disappointing, never bothered me nearly as much as that note did. I knew from experience that anger, especially pent-up anger, does nothing to the offender, but wreaks havoc upon the digestive system of the person within whom the anger fomented, so to purge myself, I composed this song and let go of it. Does that make it a personal protest song or a self-cleansing tonic for the soul?

Travis coaches Luran Doverspike on the interpretation he wants for "Flying Snakes."

Now, several years since that inciting incident, I showed "Flying Snakes" to Adam, and he, knowing nothing of its history, liked it. So did the vocalists I brought in to help in the chorus. Perhaps, its time has finally come.

HK: There are a handful of new 2014 and 2015 songs on the new album. Do you employ a computer in the songwriting process involving these copyrights?

TP: I sometimes hook my midi keyboard up to my computer and work out elements of the arrangements. And I use my computer's word processor to write lyrics, which saves time and paper. But I have never asked the computer to come up with a phrase or rhythm, musical or lyrical. My songs are the result of human imagination and conscious effort, not computer generated algorithms.

HK: You wrote a new novelty song, too. Does "Pukapuka Gagadoody" hide some deep, dark mystery, or is it just for comic relief?

TP: Last year's blizzard in my old hometown, of Boston, Massachusetts, spawned "Pukppuka Gagadoody." I lived through a number of those bitter Boston winters, and know what it's like when the deep-freeze sets in. For me, "California Dreaming" was enough, but for last year's freeze, only a south seas escape would do. Of course, that would require "crossing the line," which for first-timers crossing the equator on board a ship, involves a mysterious initiation hosted by Davey Jones, Amphitrite and King Neptune. My protagonist flew over the line, but to reach his final destination, he had to embark in a native war canoe, which, for the purposes of this song, subjected him to Neptune's rule. Of course, being a Bostonian (and therefore by definition, a sea-lawyer), he objected and argued the point.

HK: That's true, isn't it? About the crossing the line ceremony?

TP: It is, and any Old Salt worth his salt will tell you I describe the elements of the ritual accurately, although the specifics may vary somewhat from nation to nation, ship to ship and crew to crew.

HK: You also wrote two new ballads. I believe you wrote "Lovely Girl I Married" for your wife, Judy. I suspect the origins of that go back a few years.

Travis and Judy on their wedding day, October, 1968

TP: "Only You and Me" and "Lovely Girl I Married" deal with different situations, but both celebrate love. In one, a fleeting moment of passion results in a commitment made in the past, being kept in the present, and reaffirmed for the future. In the other, an enduring commitment is reaffirmed and celebrated. Writers are told there are literally no new stories to tell. The story is only as original as your perspective. Only the writer's point of view, setting, and character development may make an old familiar story, new and exciting. These two love songs reveal differing facets of love, one with a promise to remain apart, the other with a promise to stay together. I'm glad you asked. I'd never analyzed them in quite that way before.

HK: Is "Only You and Me" based on a real incident? Both ballads bring us into a reality that is not often addressed in the rock and roll, and pop world – songs of love and abiding commitment about and for "senior citizens."

TP: Consider the lyrics to "Only You and Me." If there was such an affair, I would never reveal it, would I? As for the "Lovely Girl I Married," I'm happy to say that I first met Judy in 1965, married her in 1968, and we've been together ever since. Notwithstanding my vivid imagination, without Judy, I might never have written "Lovely Girl I Married."

HK: There are also three new rock songs, "Gotta Be a Better Way," "Friend In Fresno," and "Star Maker." What prompted them, and how does that gel with what you've said previously about the way you create songs?

TP: Every now and again, I need to blast off some of my creative energy. For me, happiness is based more in mental attitude than wealth or possessions. But I am acutely aware that many of my fellow Americans are slipping into a depressing sense of declining self-worth, fed by business failures, layoffs, unemployment, and a lowered standard of living that goes hand-in-hand with official corruption, disinformation, and devious media exploitation that seriously undermine the American Dream. And it is in the face of that bleak reality that I wrote "Gotta Be a Better Way," my first protest song for the new millennium.

That need to blow off steam might also explain "Friend in Fresno." Sometimes, I just don't want to think about the constant barrage of injustice and devious, often deliberately misleading rhetoric that plagues us. I just want to rock out, to get away from it all, to do something personally gratifying, like a spontaneous musical road trip -- not just to get out of here, but to go to somewhere else. We really do have a friend in Fresno, miss her, and want her to know she is special. What better way to express friendship than in song?

The last song, "Star Maker," is my personal observation of the difference between the radio of yesteryear, radio now, and how to find a place, at my age, in a music industry I can barely recognize. In the mid-sixties of the previous century, if you had a recording, the first step up the ladder of success was to get it played on the radio by a disc jockey. If the listening public liked it, other disc jockeys might put it on their playlists too. Repeated airplay is what made good songs great, unknown artists famous, and new songs, hits.

Nowadays, physical recordings are no longer the primary means used to convey or listen to music, Cell phones and iPads are as likely to introduce new songs as radio programs. "Star Maker" is this bewildered, old-timer's reaction to this brave new world of recorded music. If the disc jockey is no longer the golden guardian of the gateway to success, who is? Particularly in L.A., where the music industry focus is primarily on youth, can a retread like me ever get any traction? I hope so, but as the old saw says "only time will tell." Well, I'm running a little short on time, and in the market for a new saw, if anybody can tell me where to find one!

HK: I think Pop culture and music coverage should devote more attention to artists who have logged 50 years, a half a century with their craft. Travis has restarted his musical journey. He's embraced the independent, self-financed, self-motivated route, and now he's writing and releasing exciting new songs at 71!

Harvey Kubernik has been an active journalist for over 44 years and is the author of eight books. During 2014, Harvey's Turn Up the Radio! Rock, Pop, and Roll in Los Angeles 1956–1972 was published by Santa Monica Press. In 2017, his Complete Rock Music History of 1967 and the Summer of Love will be published by Sterling.

Visit Kubernik's Korner to learn more about him and be kept up to date with his many works in progress.

LISTEN TO THE ALBUM OR BUY SINGLE DOWNLOADS ON YOUTUBE

BUY THE OUTSIDE THE BOX CD ON TREPSTAR